They secured the coffin and examined the appearance of the dead body through the glass plate on the top of the coffin. The body was not entirely decayed-portions of the skin still remain ing upon the neck and the lower part of the face, which showed that the body was that of a white man. The body was wrapped in a sheet which was covered with blood. Upon the portions of the skin which remained the party thought they could discover spots of blotches resembling small-pox, which induced them hurriedly to re-inter the coffin, at a distance, however, from the bank sufficiently remote to prevent its again caving luto the river.
